BACKGROUND INFO:

Hargrove was investigating a possible arson case in Tucson, AZ when he came across compromising evidence implicating an Agency operative in several violent but seemingly unconnected events in the Sun Bowl area. His methodical, intuitive investigation was cut abruptly short when an Agency operative was called in to "persuade" him to rule it as an accidental ignition.

Agent Chief, a local that Hargrove had worked with on more than one occasion, broke Agency protocol to bring him into the fold instead of eliminating him. Hargrove's new handler was understandably upset by Chief's initiative until he realized the use of an informed investigator that was also skilled enough to tamper with evidence to protect Agency assets in the field in the event of a crime.

Hargrove has a piercing gaze that rarely misses any detail, making him invaluable in the field as opposed to a desk jockey analytical job, something the aging investigator enjoys immensely. He frequently ribs his teammates when they miss the obvious clues he uncovers instantly, often waiting to see if they will draw the correct conclusions before telling them what he knows.
