BACKGROUND INFO:

Paul Fredericks joined the firehouse as a young man, eventually moving up to being a paramedic, and later, a fire chief. He feels very strongly in moral codes of conduct, though he won't hesitate to bend the rules a little if a friend or loved one is in danger. He stays fit, practicing karate and lifting weights when he isn't on call.

His newest training entails rescuing civilians from whitewater mishaps, an uncommon but dangerous fact of life with the flash floods that tear out of the mountains during the monsoon season in Arizona.

Fredericks, still known as "Chief" by the people that work with him even though he has moved on to more action-oriented jobs, is married with three grown children. Though extremely courageous, his respect for nature's power has instilled in him a cautious mindset that lets him think things through before rushing into a deadly situation.

Recommended to Agency operatives for his honor in addition to top-notch life-saving skills, Chief has taken on the role of medic for the tough missions where plans go astray. To date he has rescued seventeen beleaguered agents that otherwise would have died in action. And if agents go missing in remote areas, he is the first to volunteer to lead a rescue mission to bring them back home.

Fredericks enjoys reading vampire novels and watching martial arts movies.
