BACKGROUND INFO:

David Chen, Agent Cybertrack, grew up in Taipei, Taiwan the only son of one of the few female executives of Taipei Fubon Bank in Taiwan. David never knew his father, a French diplomat who left his mother when he was barely a year old. With his mother gone most of the time and other family members not interested in watching him, David grew up spending his affluent childhood playing with first-generation computers. David used his outgoing personality and natural affinity with technology to keep him on the good side of teachers; which he used to gain access to his high school's computer network.

From his school network David discovered he could "snoop" on much of the information that was coming online around that time, and he developed a knack for forensic computer skills. After an unsatisfying year at the prestigious National Taiwan Normal University David dropped out and traveled to France to look for his biological father. He supported himself while traveling by "snooping" for others. His natural affinity for investigation provided David with an adequate income to support his "student" lifestyle but eventually got him into trouble snooping around the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs databases. David discovered his father was actually an intelligence officer for the French Direction Générale de la Sécurité Extérieure (DGSE) about the same time the Agency discovered his hack and sent one of its recruiters to invite him to join the Agency.

Initially skeptical, David decided to join the Agency the moment the French police started knocking on his door. He remains suspicious of the timing of the Agency offer and the police raid, but so far the Agency has been a source of protection, income and state-of-the-art gadgetry. Prohibited from contacting his Father, David still intends to confront him as soon as he can find a way around the Agency watchers.
