BACKGROUND INFO:

Liane was in and out of orphanages and foster homes as a kid, having lost her parents at an early age. She never really fit in, always being the odd one out. She had a fondness for danger and risks, and was exceptionally bright. But she had difficulty with rules, which led to her getting in trouble frequently. The poor quality of the American Foster Care system didn't help either. At eighteen, in the home of a family of particularly abusive parents, Liane made her get away, and ran off into the streets, choosing to make her own way as a thief. For the next year, she survived as a burglar. She had a natural talent for it, coupled with inherent intelligence that came in handy for making detailed plans. She supported herself fairly comfortably, and was soon stealing for the thrill of it, in addition to just for the cash. To her, making off with a valuable item that was guarded by layer upon layer of security was more rewarding than the monetary value of the item itself.

Then she got caught by the police in an elaborate sting operation, and was sentenced to several years in prison. The Agency intercepted her, however, having gotten a hold of her profile, and realizing her potential. They made arrangements to have her trained as a field agent, and used their contacts in the justice department to make it possible for Liane to disappear. All that remained was to approach her. Liane was given a quiet briefing in her cell one night. The agency proposed that she come work for them. In exchange, her criminal record would vanish, and she would be free. Liane accepted without hesitation. After a year of combat, stealth and other forms of training, she was moved into active field duty as an acquisitions expert. Liane enjoys her work, mainly in creating detailed plans and executing them. She enjoys the thrill and danger of operations, and is always at ease, even in the most tense of situations. She's also spent a significant time on the firing range, and her psychological profile indicates that she's not a callous killer, she would be quite capable of killing to protect her team's and the Agency's interests.
