BACKGROUND INFO:

His overbearing mother pushed Jonathan Swales, the product of an affluent lawyering family, into UC Berkeley directly after high school. He studied pharmacology for two semesters before leaving the college and a nearly arranged marriage to an up and coming female grad student. Traveled the world for a short period before landing in Sofia, Bulgaria, home of the Natural Museum of Military History. Swales developed an almost fanatical study of foreign militaries and tactics in his four-year stay.

At the sudden death of his mother, Swales returned to the states to make amends with what remained of his family and landed a job developing counterfeit-resistant inks for the fraud department of the Secret Service. After several years his team perfected the bills in circulation today. He later moved on to another appointment to the National Emergency Crisis Center, starting mid-tier and quickly moving up the ranks to Assistant Director. Left the NECC after his predictions of a terrorist attack on major national landmarks went unheeded shortly before the tragic events of 9-11.

The Agency pounced, recruiting Swales just before he left the United States in disgust over the government ineptitude and corruption. Jonathan Swales shows an unusually high degree of memory retention, and enjoys watching the History Channel for its detailed descriptions of military maneuvers and tactics. He is also a master planner, seeming to anticipate problems before they arise, changing plans of action on the fly as the situation unfolds.

He married a Bulgarian bride while abroad, and now has two children a son and a daughter, 7 and 8 years old. He prefers to work from headquarters where he has access to many information sources, but has been known to enter the field on high-profile missions requiring his expertise.
